

Environmental Regulations

The Larkin Hoffman environmental regulation practice group has substantial experience in environmental regulatory and permitting matters as well as environmental litigation.

Our experienced lawyers handle environmental impact statement preparation and processing, alternative urban area-wide review, the Minnesota Wetland Conservation Act, Department of Natural Resources and Army Corps of Engineers permitting and litigation of environment-related disputes.

We assist developers in the zoning and approval process, ensuring that appropriate environmental reviews are completed and the proper permits are secured. Our knowledgeable team ensures compliance with the constantly changing regulatory framework involved in this field. Our experienced team of litigators stands ready to handle any environmental dispute, whether in an administrative contested case hearing, in district court or before the Minnesota Supreme Court. We provide definitive analysis, practical solutions and persuasive advocacy.

Larkin Hoffman also assists clients who have land use permit issues, such as wetlands permitting. Our lobbyists are experienced at representing clients' environmental interests before city councils, county boards, regulatory agencies and the state legislature. We understand how the process works and we are there to lead clients through to a successful outcome. As environmental issues continue to be a hot topic on both the local and national level, there is an ever increasing need for effective representation in this area.
